Chip Inventories Swell as Consumers Buy Fewer Gadgets

Semiconductor companies slash production plans amid weak demand

HP and Dell, two of the largest PC makers, had their products fly off of the shelves earlier in the pandemic.

The world is now awash in chips.

The oversupply marks a sharp turnaround from a global shortage during two years of supercharged demand. Consumer appetite for electronics has weakened against a backdrop of rising interest rates, a falling stock market and recession fears. Chip inventories are swelling, mirroring what is happening in the wider economy where retailers are stuck with goods on their shelves and producers of a range of products in high demand early in the pandemic now face a glut.
